A FOURFOOTED PARACUTE

(By C. A. D.)

The boy who tugs a heavy sled up a long hill from the bottom, can appreciate how it is with the little animal called the flying squirrel. This o-called flying squirrel does not really fly at all, he just rides down an imaginary air hill, only after a long, hard climb up some rough-barked tree. If one should drop a piece of cardboard from an upstairs window, and could manage to keep the flat side down it would sail off and strike the ground some distance away. Well the flying squirrel is nothing more or less than a piece of cardboard covered with the softest fur. Way back in the beginning of things, nature says that he was not quite flat enough to sail instead of falling, so she stretched a strip of skin from his front legs and fastened the other ends firmly to his wings. When he springs in the air he naturally holds all four feet straight out from his body thus spreading these side gliders to their utmost and incidentally increasing his flat surface fully threefold. When not in use, these side-gliders tuck up close to his body, giving rather an attractive finish to his trim little person. In his coat of slate colored fur, and with a tail so flat, that it looks as if it had just come from a laundry, he is a most pleasing appearing little fellow. Few animals, unless it be the mole, can boast of fur so soft; it is more like silk velvet than fur, and is always kept in the most spotless condition. His chief charm lies, in his eyes, which are large, liquid, and sparkling; his ears are small and inconspicuous, and his teeth long and sharp. The flying squirrel loves the skyscrapers of the woods and no tree is too high for him to find a convenient hollow and call it home. Down in the chosen cavity, he makes his nest, taking great pains to line it with grass, leaves, and any thing soft he can find. He evidently believes in having things comfortable around where he stays, and well he may, as he spends most of his time in bed, snuggled up in a little round ball, with his tail over his eyes to shut out the light. He sleeps through the day, and does not get up until the long shadows are slowly meeting into the dusk of twilight. Then he comes out, sits on a limb close to the trunk, and makes an elaborate toilet, licking and smoothing his fur, and combing out the long hair of that lustrous tail. When not in use as an accessory parachute, the tail is carried neatly spread over his back. Climbing up the trunk of his tree until he attains a height from which if a line were drawn to the roots of the tree a hundred yards away the line would form the hypotenuse of a right angle triangle. The trunk of his tree and the distance between the trees being the other two sides, he jumps boldly out in the air, and slides down the imaginary hill landing lightly at the root of the intended tree. Clambering up to the proper height, he again launches forth for another flight, thus making his nightly round of the grove. As night is his daylight, he may live right around our house, and unless we are very careful to watch for him in the gathering darkness, he is apt to fly unseen. As there is no beating of wings of course his flight is noiseless, and one has to be quick eyed and alert to detect the little phantom shape that sails down from one tree to the base of another. There is one member of the outdoor company who watches for his stealthy flight and keeps up with the house, getting up and going to bed, and that is the owl the bird who is all eyes.

CROP SITUATION MUCH IMPROVED BY RAINS

General "Season" Needed to Effectually Break Drought

Columbia, S. C., June 2.--Drenching rains have fallen during the week over the northwestern counties, and moderate showers only have occurred over the coastal plain, where much more rain is still needed to effectually break the prevailing drought. On the whole, the general crop situation is coming to a good stand now; everywhere, and some planters have begun chopping. The oat harvest continues, and wheat reaping will begin soon. Sweet potatoes are being transplanted.

and appetite. To her, he is more than interesting study, he is a staple article of diet. When the owl gets through with a pathetic little bodiless tail on the grass marks the scene of the midnight tragedy. The lights in our home seem to have the same attraction for him that they have for moths, consequently it is not unusual thing for him to wander in through open door or window, causing the same wild commotion among the female members of the family, as a terrible mouse would arouse he feeds on acorns, small nuts, and the leaf buds of the trees! he is particularly fond of the young cones of the pine. He never feels at ease on the ground, and seldom trusts himself there unless it is a case of necessity; one reason for the timidity on the ground may be because his movements are rather slow, and if an enemy should spy him there his chances of escape would be of the slightest. He is lacking in the wonderful agility of his big cousin, the gray squirrel, and did he expose himself as constantly, his family would soon be represented only by scattered tails on the grass. He seldom ventures out except in pleasant weather, cold and wet send him scuttling to the bottom of his comfortable nest.

Bowel Complaints in India. In a lecture at one of the Des Moines, Iowa, churches a missionary from India told of going into the interior of India where he was taken sick; that he had a bottle of Chamberlain's Remedy-Choile and Diarrhoea Remedy with him and believed that it saved his life. This remedy is used successfully in India both as a preventive and cure for cholera. You may know from this that it can be depended upon for the milder forms of bowel complaint that occur in this country. Obtainable everywhere.
